Prospects for Increased Post-65 Career Employment for the Baby Boom Generation James B. Huntington 2007 Despite useful skills, less than a third of Americans over age 65 work, fewer still have meaningful careers. The opportunity for careers is important for those unwilling to retire and a source of significant income for others, yet there has been limited research. As part of this study, specific research questions addressed whether there is a relationship among age, gender, or education levels and senior citizens' interest in careers and if there is a relationship between line of business and employers' willingness to hire older workers. Senior citizens and potential employers in Florida were surveyed with Chi-square and R2 analyses completed on the data. The results demonstrated no significant difference among age, gender, or education levels and senior citizens' interest in careers or the perceptions of employers by line of business. The study did find senior citizens were interested in careers with variable hours or enhanced vacations. Nearly thirty-five percent of senior citizens, however, were discouraged from searching for these positions or did know they existed; yet eighty-seven percent of employers cited a lack of older applicants. The results demonstrate a potential mismatch between the interest of senior citizens seeking meaningful careers and employers. One important step is to develop support systems that can effectively connect older workers with employers. From a societal perspective, presenting senior citizens with meaningful careers is an important step in recognizing the valuable contributions of older workers and an essential source of additional income for individuals facing retirement with limited financial means.

Pension Reform in Europe Camila Arza 2007-08-07 This new book provides a cross-country comparative analysis of the key issues shaping the latest pension reforms in Europe: political games, welfare models and pathways, population reactions, and observed and expected outcomes. Pension reform has been a top policy priority for European governments in the last decade. Ageing populations, changing labour market patterns and the process of European integration are the 'irresistible forces' pushing for reform throughout the region. The Political Economy of Pension Reform evaluates the political forces that make pension reform viable in different national and institutional contexts and the nature of political bargains, actors and cleavages surrounding policy change. The volume also examines the nature and outcomes of pension reform experiences in Europe, searching for a solution to the financial challenge posed by growing pension budgets. By addressing the nature of change, the pathways of reform, and the outcomes of the new pension mix in the region, the authors conclude with an analysis of people's perceptions and attitudes towards pension policy and their acceptance or otherwise of different reform options. This book will be of interest to students and scholars of international political economy, European politics, and social policy.

The Impact of the 65 MPH Speed Limit on Virginia's Rural Interstate Highways Through 1990

Cheryl Lynn 1992 In April of 1987, Congress passed the Surface Transportation and Uniform Relocation Assistance Act (STURAA), which permitted states to raise their maximum speed limit on rural interstate highways (rural interstates) to 65 mph. Virginia's 65 mph speed limit went into effect July 1, 1988, for passenger vehicles and on July 1, 1989, for commercial buses. This report is the fourth in a series of reports to examine the 65 mph speed limit in Virginia and summarizes 30 months of experience with the 65 mph speed limit. Following the implementation of the 65 mph speed limit, average and 85th percentile speeds increased on Virginia's rural interstates, and fatal crashes and fatalities increased significantly. On Virginia's urban interstates, on which the speed limit remained at 55 mph, there was a smaller increase in average and 85th percentile speeds, but there was not a significant increase in fatal crashes or fatalities. National data show a substantial increase in rural interstate fatalities in states that increased the rural interstate speed limit to 65 mph and a decrease in states that maintained a 55 mph speed limit. The data in this report clearly show that speeds, fatal crashes, and fatalities increased on Virginia's rural interstates after the implementation of the 65 mph speed limit. However, these data do not reflect causation. It is possible that factors other than the change in the speed limit such as changes in traffic volumes, trip patterns, or trip purposes-are responsible for part or all of the increase in fatal crashes and fatalities. Causative issues will be addressed in the final report in this series, to be published in 1993.
